

The Banking Migration to Ireland

Brexit has been a major buzzword for the past two years. As with all big change, it presents opportunities alongside many challenges. No one knows exactly what will happen in March 2019 — but this has not stopped governments and companies from creating contingency plans and de-entanglement projects.

Dublin comes out on top

Over the past 6 to 12 months, Dublin has consistently emerged as the preferred European hub. It still benefits from favourable tax laws (slowly being eroded in Luxembourg), is an English-speaking EU country in the London time zone, and offers a relatively simple and cost-effective transition for London-based operations.

JP Morgan is pushing hard and spending significantly to build Dublin operations. Credit Suisse will move its Prime Brokerage function there. Citi Bank will build out its operations team. State Street will push for new Transfer Agency business. Vendor organisations like Multifonds and Temenos stand to benefit from increased revenues across the board.

Is the future of European Banking in Ireland — or will it move to the continent?

Only time will tell, but it is best to prepare for both outcomes. Whether moving people within the EU or outside it, the demand for specialist financial services talent across Dublin is already accelerating.
